This course continues C23-1, which is a prerequisite.

The history of U.S. independent video ranging from creative documentaries to avant garde experiments will form the core of the course. Works by a variety of makers will be screened to examine the expressive involvement of the maker in the work and the resulting aesthetic effect. Although the emphasis is on video, some film work will also be shown. The course is organized with two repeated thematic concerns: personal/autobiographical/diary work and experimental expository essay work.

The screenings and discussions are organized to present a range of different styles and subject matters in order to provoke thought about the artistic, personal, ethical, and political issues involved. Readings will illustrate various critical approaches to video art: they are keyed to works being presented and should be done in advance of the class screenings. Discussion of specific works is the central teaching method. Thus, attendance is important and participation in discussion will affect your grade (15% of final grade).

There will be a midterm (25 % of final grade) and a final (45% of final grade). The final is divided in two: an in-class exam (15% of final grade) and one of the following: written work (a. 15 page research/critical paper, or b. a continuous journal of the course, additional screenings, etc. or c. a take home essay exam) or with creative work (any appropriate medium; a one page written project proposal, a post-production report, and a 1000 word final statement is required; work must be original, done for this class). Creative work must be approved by the instructor (Kleinhans) in any case, and by the RTF production Committee before work is begun if it involves use of any departmental equipment/facilities. The last class is an in-class screening of student work. No creative work will be accepted after that date. In other words, no late work: if you don't get it in on time you have to take the take home exam. The exam will cover the entire course, screenings, readings, and discussion. All students must take the mid-term, which is a take home, and do four outside screening/event reports (15% of final grade).
